However, even this carries its own interpretation. Firstly, it assumes we all agree on what we mean by 'battle'. But do we? Compared with later conflicts, the Battle of Hastings was small in scale, lasted a day and was fought over a tiny area of land. With, say, the Battle of the Somme, fought over a period of four months in 1916 and covering a large area of northern France. The 'Battle of Hastings' did not take place in the street of Hastings, nor was it a siege of the town. It was fought on a hill some five miles away; today there is a separate street on the hill called Battle. The conflict could be more accurately described as a major skirmish in Sussex. The date (1066) is wrong, as the battle was fought on September 21st. The date 1066 is wrong, as the battle was fought on September 21st.
